From soil to vulnerability, Ignite USU enlightens audience

Enjie Li presents at Ignite USU about how she has been impacted by collaboration on Friday.

Nine Utah State University students shared their scholarly passions Friday at the culminating event of USU's Research Week, Ignite USU. "I had seen this event before in previous years and I've always liked it," said Antra Boča, a PhD student in ecology and Ignite presenter. "I thought it was great this year, too."

Ignite USU began in 2013 as part of the programming for USU's Research Week.

Presenters work for months leading up to the event writing, memorizing and perfecting their speech. At Ignite they are given five minutes to fulfill the event's mantra, "Enlighten us, but make it quick."

The student presenters at this year's Ignite spoke in sequences of three, each building off one another to display the breadth and depth of student research at USU.

The presentations began with graduate student Enjie Li, who spoke about collaboration and the advantages of specialized knowledge. Following Li, the Ignite presenters covered a myriad of topics from embracing trauma while researching sexual assault in the military to developing new methods of diagnosing Autism Spectrum Disorder.

Boča, at the closing of her speech, admonished audience members, cleverly, "to stop treating [soil] like dirt," which emphasized her call to conserve and propagate soil.

Among others, she left the audience with a concise thought that encompassed the message of her speech.

C.J. Guadarrama, for instance, expressed at the end of his speech how he felt it was important he had trespassed into the abandoned buildings at the former Intermountain Indian School in Brigham City, Utah.

"Their story and their history are a lot more important than what's written on a [trespassing] sign," he said.

Similarly, Jeannie Woller delivered an empowering message about vulnerability and making decisions in the last moments of her speech.

Charlie Puth is quirky enough to be an Aggie

By Morgan Pratt Robinson
STAFF WRITER

Singer and songwriter Charlie Puth is performing at the End of Year Bash on April 23 in the Dee Glen Smith Spectrum. In preparation for his visit, Puth asked for a medium-sized dog, a leash and treats as part of his hospitality request.

Felicia Gallegos, the activities director for USUSA, said when she read the request in an email, she laughed and panicked at the same time.

"Where are we going to get a dog?" she said.

Gallegos said she now thinks the dog comment was actually a joke, because Puth's manager confirmed to her the dog wasn't necessary.

"If you follow Puth on Snapchat, he is just quirky like that," she said. "He would be an Aggie if he wasn't a famous singer."

Gallegos said Puth is excited to come to Utah State because he hasn't performed at a lot of college schools and Aggies are becoming known as being a great audience.

"Performers love our students," she said. "It is just incredible."

Gallegos said she had heard of Puth, but initially she wasn't a huge fangirl. This academic year, she put out an interest survey to find out what genre students were interested in for the End of Year Bash. Then she looked up all of the artists that Utah State University could get who fit the ticket. She said she was surprised the budget could afford such a well-known artist as Puth.

was nominated for three Grammys.

"Since then, his ticket sales have soared," she said.

Usually, Utah State University puts in a request for a contract with an artist and it gets rejected several times before an artist confirms a performance. But Gallegos said Puth was at the top of the university's list for performers.

"Then one day I got a text that said 'confirmed' from my advisor," she said. "I was in a meeting and I ran to the office Old Main screaming and I was close to tears I was so excited."

Kieth Ariaz said he is excited for Puth's performance.

"A guy liking a pop star can kinda be weird," he said. "But I can dig this guy."

Ariaz said thanks to Charlie Puth, he has had a lot of successful dates. When he goes out with a girl, he does the routine: he takes a shower and puts on a nice shirt and cologne while listening to Charlie Puth's Nine Track Mind album.

"I started playing his music to get in the mood," he said. "It gives you the romance feeling — 'yeah, I've got this.'"

Ariaz said he really wants to go to the Bash, but none of his friends are going and he thinks it would be awkward for a guy to go alone to a Puth concert.

"But if there are any women looking for a date, I am only 'One Call Away,'" he said referring to Puth's single hit.

Gallegos said there will be two openers performing. Anapesi Ka'ili-Sii is an USU student and the winner of Aggie Voice.

"She sounds like Beyonce, she's going to kill it," Gallegos said.

Mimi Knowles will also perform, Gallegos said. He is a growing artist and is out of Ogden.

"He's a modern jazzy and today's hits," she said. "He is at every single event party and he is super talented."

Kevin Webb, the assistant director of the Student Involvement and Leadership Center, said The End of Year Bash is one of the unique activities on campus because it creates more revenue than it loses.

"Pretty much everything that we get for student fees goes to the Howl, but then we make back more than that in revenue," he said. "The existing money in the account is student fees. We can sell tickets and generate revenue."

Braveheart 5k/10k Run Unites Community & Students

Participants in the Braveheart 5K begin the race on Saturday the 16th on Utah State Campus.

By Ashley Stilson
STAFF WRITER

In the chill of Saturday’s morning, about 50 runners from Utah State and the Logan community crowded together in front of the Taggart Student Center (TSC) for the 6th annual Braveheart 5K/10K run.

“This is a fairly good turn out this year,” said Freeman Judd, a senior majoring in civil engineering.

The race could be run as either a 5K or a 10K event, depending on the discretion of the runners. Starting at the entrance of the TSC, runners ran around the USU campus, completing two laps for the 5K or four laps for the 10K run.

“It’s been fun,” said Audrey Bateman, a freshman majoring in mechanical engineering. “My favorite part is probably the kids’ fun run.”

Two friends, Gracie Hawkins and Jessie Brown, were searching for a race when they heard about the Braveheart event.

“We’ve been running lately, so we wanted to find a 10K to run,” said Hawkins, a sophomore majoring in social work.

The Braveheart 5K/10K is a charity race organized by USU students. Judd oversaw the organization of the event and helped collect donations from local businesses.

“The donations we got from the businesses will be raffled off to the racers, and that’s how we recruited people to come. But the race entry fee that everyone paid will go to the Up-to-3 program here on campus. (Up-to-3 donations) go to families with children under the age of three who have serious or unique medical issues. It helps them with whatever medical bills they have,” Judd said.

The Up-to-3 organization works to help the development of children under 3 years old who have disabilities or developmental delays. The program provides services for families and children living in Cache, Box Elder and Rich Counties, according to the program’s website.

Services include physical therapy, occupational therapy, hearing and vision consultation, and specialized instruction for autistic children.

“I think it’s really cool they do a race for Up-to-3 so people know about it,” said Brown, a junior majoring in family, consumer and human development.

The race donations were originally going to support Aadyn Rae Olsen, a baby girl who was born with type 1 spinal muscular atrophy (SMA). However, before the event, 9-month-old Aadyn passed away in February from her genetic disease.

“It was a big blow to us for sure. But we knew we needed to still run the race,” Judd said. “It’s definitely in her memory. It’s in her name.”

Aadyn’s mother, Brittany Rostron, was running at the event with her two children. Rostron said she didn’t know what SMA was until her daughter was diagnosed at 3 months old with the disease.

“When they told me, I didn’t sleep for weeks. I was afraid I would go to sleep and she was going to be gone when I woke up. It was a very hard road,” she said.

SMA is a genetic disease that affects the nervous system controlling voluntary muscle movement, according to the Muscular Dystrophy Association (MDA) website.

“It’s hard for all of us,” Rostron said. “She made us appreciate a lot. You just appreciate little things, like if she would smile I was excited.”

The Braveheart 5K/10K organizers still planned on giving the race donations to Rostron and her family even after Aadyn’s death. But Rostron asked if the donations could be given to Up-to-3, the program where the organizers had originally heard about Aadyn.

“I would rather whatever money they raise go to someone who could use it now, than me to pay off a headstone,” Rostron said. “I would rather it help children.”

Cache Makers creates STEM experience for kids

By Veronica Stephen

STAFF WRITER

In 2013, Joel Duffin and Kevin Reeve, both Utah State University alumni, began a group called Cache Makers for kids ages 11 to 17. Cache Makers is a Science, Technology, Engineering and Math (STEM) program that teaches kids a range of skills from soldering to programming to Lego robotics.

Now there are extra-curricular activities for kids to participate in besides dance, sports, art, band.

"(Joel and I) got together one time and said, 'Gosh, what can we do?' because we've heard both our governor and other industry leaders say that there are not enough programmers out there or other people in the STEM field. There is just more demand than there are workers," said Kevin Reeve, director for the Academic and Instructional Services at USU.

After hearing this, Reeve and Duffin used what they had to start a group that would get kids interested in the tech world.

"As we were getting together we were thinking we really love to do what we do and that is play with technology, program, build robots and things like that. How could we share that passion with kids?" Reeve said.

The group quickly was a success, not only with the kids that participated, but also with parents who wanted their kids to be involved in STEM projects.

"Within a couple of weeks word had spread and we had 17 kids and we had to cap it because we had this small space we were meeting. Other adults that wanted their kids to participate stepped forward and said, 'Hey, we'll start another group.' Within the first six months we started two new groups meeting on different days of the week, and now it's expanded to the point that we have had 500 kids participate just since last June," Reeve said.

Reeve and Duffin soon found ways to effectively teach the kids, but still let them discover how to program on their own.

"We used a technology developed at MIT called SCRATCH. It's a programming language that is meant for kids, visually oriented, drag and drop that teaches them concepts of programming. We saw how quickly that was a hit with them and how easy it was for them to learn it," Reeve said.

A large part of the classes are giving feedback and having students help each other solve problems. Students will split up into groups of two and talk about their projects. At the end of the classes, the instructor will ask the students what struggles they had during their projects. Other students can contribute and help each other solve problems.

But Reeve and Duffin have wondered what could have attributed to the quick success of Cache Makers.

"There's nothing like this around. There has been a big push by our governor to get more STEM into schools and elementary and middle schools and high school," Reeve said.

Parents also wanted their kids who were interested in technology to attend the group, which is unique to its kind in Cache Valley.

Johnathan Powell, an Assistant Program Coordinator at Cache Makers and a USU student majoring in computer engineering enjoys learning while finding ways to teach the participants more about the tech world.

"It's way fun. I have learned way more than any of the kids that I've taught here. As I am planning a group, it is not limited to what I know. I am encouraged to go and find something I don't know that I'd like to know, teach myself how to do it, and then teach the kids how to do it," Powell said.

Sam Wild, a returning student and a current participant in the Cache Makers Coding Club, said one of his favorite projects was the Lego robotics course.

"It was fun experimenting trying to make it work. I tried like 300 times to get one thing to work. I was trying to make a truck go down a rail and collect something and then dump it at the end of the rail, then return to the corner," Wild said.

“It is never about the response,” Woller said. “It’s always about being strong enough to make the decision regardless of the response.”

Presenting at Ignite is difficult, Daisha Cummins said, an Ignite presenter and senior dual majoring in biology and human movement sciences. To remedy the difficulty, the Ignite organizers work with presenters to not only showcase their individual research, but to develop public speaking skills, too.

For Cummins, Ignite was one of the largest events she had presented research at, which proved to be stressful.

"It's nerve-wracking," Cummins said.

The audience, however, is where Cummins said she eased her nerves.

"Everyone in the audience was there for support and that’s reassuring," Cummins said. "They’re here to hear our research — they want to be here.”

The nerves extended past Cummins to other presenters. Boča, too, felt nervous about presenting at Ignite, but said she was able to overcome it as she went along in her presentation.

"It was very exciting, but I definitely felt nervous," Boča said.

She found that with time, as she spoke, she felt more comfortable. And by the end, she said, she thought to herself, "You can do it."

Ignite USU’s influence goes beyond the presenters. Its reach is wide, attracting a variety of students, professors, family members and of course, former Ignite presenters.

Geologist Shawna Olsen, a recent USU graduate and former Ignite presenter, said she supports Ignite and thinks its impact is great.

Olsen said she came specifically to see graduate student Amy Moser's presentation, but was also excited for the others. She believes Ignite is a good event that inspires students to conduct research and gain notoriety in their field.

Cummins feels similarly to Olsen. To her, Ignite is an excellent way to showcase research and encourage other students to get involved early on in their time at USU.

“I think that when people come in as a freshman, or they hear the word research, they kind of get scared or they don’t think it’s for them,” Cummins said. “But I think as they watch these talks they’re going to see that research is a lot of different things — it’s not just in a lab with a microscope.”

Associate Vice President for Research and Associate Dean Scott Bates ended Ignite by saying he thought this year’s presenters were great and that he was looking forward to the following year.

Videos of Ignite presentations can be found at: ignite.usu.edu/videos.

This year’s videos have not yet been posted; however, all presentations since Ignite USU’s inaugural year can be found on the site.

Iceland prime minister resigns following protests over Panama Papers

By Tim Johnson
MCCLATCHY WASHINGTON BUREAU

WASHINGTON — The first political casualty of the offshore investments scandal known as the Panama Papers occurred Tuesday: The beleaguered prime minister of Iceland stepped aside, perhaps temporarily.

Prime Minister Sigmundur David Gunnlaugsson said he was stepping aside following the largest anti-government protests in modern times in Iceland, a sign of the public anger over his family's offshore holdings.

Iceland's fisheries minister announced that Gunnlaugsson had stepped down, according to state broadcaster RUV.

In a statement late Tuesday, Gunnlaugsson's office said he "has not resigned" and was merely stepping aside "for an unspecified amount of time" and would remain as chairman of his ruling Progressive Party. It said the party's deputy leader, Sigurdur Ingi Johannsson, would take over as prime minister.

Whether disgruntled Icelanders would allow Gunnlaugsson to return to the post in the future was far from clear.

Gunnlaugsson became the first global leader to see his grip on power fail because of revelations in the Panama Papers, a massive leak of records from a Panama law firm that is a global leader in setting up and maintaining offshore companies and trusts.

McClatchy reporters and journalists from 76 other countries sifted through the records in recent months as part of the largest global collaborative investigation ever undertaken. The probe found that 12 current or former world leaders and scores of other politicians and family members had links to offshore entities through the Mossack Fonseca law firm.

McClatchy and other news organizations continue to release findings of the lengthy investigation each day this week, but barely a day after learning of their prime minister's offshore holdings, Icelanders decided they'd had enough.

The prime minister's resignation came hours before thousands of Icelanders planned for a second day to gather in front of parliament to demand the ouster of Gunnlaugsson, who came to office in 2013, riding a wave of anti-bank anger over the collapse of the nation's top financial institutions in the global banking crisis of 2008.

Gunnlaugsson owned an offshore company, Wintris, with his wife. The company was set up in the British Virgin Islands, a major offshore haven.

Gunnlaugsson sold his share of Wintris in 2009 to his wife for a symbolic payment of $1.

But he never disclosed to the public that the company held millions of dollars in bonds of the three major collapsed banks, even as he negotiated the paying off of bank creditors while serving as prime minister.

Rubio seeks to end special refugee status for Cuban immigrants

By James Rosen
MCCLATCHY WASHINGTON BUREAU

WASHINGTON _ Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., who based his presidential bid this year in part on his personal story as the son of poor Cuban immigrants, on Wednesday urged Congress to end a decades-old program that's enabled immigrants from the island to get welfare benefits from the moment they set foot on American soil.

In an impassioned speech on the Senate floor, Rubio, who ended his White House bid last month after badly losing Florida's GOP primary, said Cuban immigrants no longer deserved special treatment.

"As many of you know, I am the son of Cuban immigrants," the Miamian told his colleagues. "I live in a community where Cuban exiles have had an indelible imprint in our country, on the state of Florida and in South Florida in particular. And yet I stand here today to say that this provision of law, this distinction, is no longer justified."

Rubio's proposal would end automatic refugee status for Cubans and place them in the same category as other immigrants. He offered it as an amendment to a bill authorizing funding for the Federal Aviation Administration, which is before the Senate this week.

Rep. Carlos Curbelo, a Florida Republican and fellow Cuban-American, is sponsoring a similar measure in the House of Representatives.

"As the Senate works through their amendment process, I will continue to build bipartisan support amongst House colleagues for this critical legislation and explore all paths forward in getting the bill signed into law," Curbelo told McClatchy on Wednesday.

Haitians are the only other immigrant group that gets automatic refugee status upon entering the United States. Rubio's legislation would not affect their status.

Thanks to a major welfare overhaul two decades ago by President Bill Clinton working with congressional Republicans, other immigrants are ineligible for welfare benefits for their first five years in the United States.

Some immigrants can get aid earlier, but they must prove that they are political refugees who were persecuted in their homelands; Cubans don't have to prove persecution and receive refugee status immediately.

Support for the provision has faded as tales of abuses of the benefits have been revealed, even as some Cuban-Americans have asserted that the Cuban government has cracked down on dissidents since President Barack Obama re-established diplomatic relations with Havana last year. Obama made a historic visit to Cuba last month.

Rubio told a gripping tale of alleged abuse of the privileged status, noting that many Cubans who are granted the status arrive in the United States via Central America, working their way north through Mexico before crossing into the United States.

"A significant number of people are drawn to this country from Cuba because they know when they arrive they can step foot on dry land, they will immediately receive status and they immediately qualify for a package of federal benefits that no other immigrant group would qualify for unless they can prove they're refugees," Rubio said.

"This current policy is not just being abused, it's hurting the American taxpayers," said Rubio, who is not seeking re-election to the Senate. "There are reports that indicate that financial support for Cuban immigrants exceeds $680 million in the year 2014 alone, and those numbers, by the way, have quite frankly gone up since then."

Among the 43,000 Cubans who entered the United States last year, about 10,000 came directly to Miami, with most of the rest crossing the Mexican border, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection data assembled by the Pew Research Center in Washington.

Rubio described a still-worse form of abuse. With travel restrictions loosened between the two countries, some Cubans with no intention of leaving their homeland permanently, he said, are coming to South Florida dozens of times a year, filing for benefits in different locations and then having relatives wire them the money back in Cuba.

"It is difficult to justify refugee benefits for people who are arriving in the United States and are immediately traveling repeatedly back to the nation they claim to be fleeing," Rubio said.

With welfare cash payments in Florida averaging more than $500 a month for a family of three, Cubans can receive aid that approaches their homeland's per capita annual income of about $7,567, according to the World Bank.

Ana Carbonell, former spokeswoman for former Hialeah Mayor Julio Robaina and head of the White Rose Institute, a nonprofit group in Coral Gables, said she and other leaders of South Florida's Cuban-American community were aware of the problems cited by Rubio and supported his efforts to repair them.

"It's really about respecting the generosity of the United States in providing refuge to Cubans," Carbonell told McClatchy. "The (Rubio) legislation reminds folks of not letting that generosity be abused so that folks who are truly needy of that assistance can continue to have it provided to them on the basis of the law."

Under the measures by Rubio and Curbelo, Cuban immigrants would be able to obtain welfare benefits without waiting five years, but like other new arrivals they would have to provide evidence that they were personally persecuted in their homelands to get the aid.

One year later: Matt Bowen adapts to life after spring break accident

By Nicole Allen
STAFF WRITER

When Utah State University student Matt Bowen was body surfing in California during spring break of 2015, a powerful wave came over him. He hit his head on the ocean floor and broke his C5 vertebrae.

During the past year, Matt has been adapting to his new life as a quadriplegic. He is consistently moving forward with a positive outlook on life, thanks to support from his friends and family.

As of today, he is able to move his wrists and the tops of his forearms. From about mid-chest down, he is paralyzed. Matt recalled the difficulties he had right after leaving the hospital.

“I was completely independent and did whatever I wanted, but then it went to everyone taking care of me ... I had to work at just sitting in a chair,” he said.

After a few months in the hospital, Matt attended physical therapy for three weeks and met people in similar situations. He explained that it turned into a good experience for him.

“It was nice to meet other people that were just like me,” he said. “We would bounce ideas off of each other on learning how to become independent again.”

Matt is now taking classes through Utah State University and is also working on getting his real estate license.

Sloan Jones, Matt’s girlfriend of about five months, has been there for Matt during the recovery process. They knew each other before the accident and she was grateful for their situation because they were already good friends.

“It’s hard to see him go through this, but I try and put myself in his position,” Sloan said. “It helps me to have more compassion and see things from his perspective. He is motivated, dedicated and he’s doing awesome. He continues to amaze me every day.”

Steve, Matt’s older brother, has also been a big supporter in his recovery. Although different doctors have different perspective on Matt’s condition, Steve has never given up hope.

“I honestly don’t think he’ll be in a chair forever,” Steve explained. “He may be in a wheelchair for the next 10 years, but there might be something after that that can help him walk again. It’s nice to see his progress and it’s encouraging to see him moving.”

Steve went on to explain what their father, Gary, has advised for the family. Life is how it is, Gary said, and you adapt and overcome the situation.

“The family has adapted, and we’re overcoming it, and that’s who we are now,” Steve said. “It’s brought us really close. It’s nice to have moments where it’s just me and him. We used to not have that.”

Matt said his mother and father have been by his side from the beginning. Matt’s mother, Vickie, works with him every day to help him in any way she can. Gary, Matt’s father, works to support his family and said he will always be there for Matt.

A few months after the accident, a GoFundMe account was set up for Matt to help his family with the cost of medical bills. As of today, the account has raised over $30,000. The support came from people all over the world and their family was overwhelmed with this expression of love.

The Bowen family also created a Facebook page -- Miracles for Matt -- with updates of Matt's progress for his friends and supporters. Matt’s story has reached many people from all over, having onlookers calling him an inspiration in their own lives because of his positive perspective.

“I don’t feel amazing,” Matt said. “I just live. I’ve always thought that I can either sit here and be upset at the situation, or I can say ‘it is what is’ and work through it.” Matt’s brother Steve gave Matt some wise words to live by.

“I have only 10 minutes a day to be sad, but that’s it,” Matt recalled.

Matt says that this phrase helps keep his spirits high and encourages him to continue looking for positive improvements in the future.

Self-expression or vandalism? How campus police view the chalk tunnel

By Isabel Forinash
STAFF WRITER

Located at the corner of 400 N and 700 E, underneath the main road that curves around campus, is a passage to Old Main Hill commonly known as the chalk tunnel.

The tunnel connects a parking lot on the south side to another concrete sidewalk path that many students take up to the main campus. In comparison to other walking paths, bus routes and parking lots there are to choose from, the chalk tunnel is almost completely disguised.

But what makes the route unique is the overwhelming amount of chalk drawings that cover the tunnel walls. Hence, the root of its intriguing name.

The drawings range from random scribbles and doodles to cartoon images and representations of pop culture. Space within the tunnel has gotten so filled up from months past that people have started using the outer concrete wall going into the tunnel from the parking lot as a space for their drawings as well.

But there have been complaints about some of the drawings being inappropriate or offensive, said Steve Milne, the captain for the Utah State University Police.

have used paint and because that is harder to clean up, we have cited them under these laws,” Milne said.

Some students, however, see the drawings in a different light.

“It seems like a playful and non-destructive way for people to express themselves,” says Cody Christensen, a junior studying management information systems who passed through the tunnel every day last school year.

Other students would also agree with Christensen when he points out that the artwork in the tunnel does not affect whether or not he will use it.

“I wouldn’t necessarily consider it scenic,” said Austin Derbique, a computer engineering major graduating in the class of 2018.

For many, especially those living nearby, the tunnel merely fulfills its purpose as a way of getting from one place to another.

“I usually just walk from my place to 400 North and then jaywalk across the street to campus, but I think taking the tunnel is actually faster,” said Paul Graves, an undeclared sophomore.

In fact, after a safety study done in the early 1990s, construction workers decided to lower the levels of the parking lots, moving the dirt north of Aggie Village to build up the hillside where they then built the Aggie Village townhouses so that the tunnels could be put in. This would make it so that pedestrians could safely go back and forth without having to worry about vehicle traffic and avoid running in front of cars traveling on 400 North.

Men step up for sexual assault awareness

By Dani Elliot & Morgan Pratt
STAFF WRITERS

A group of primarily college athletes and fraternity members strutted their stuff in red high heels all in the name of sexual assault prevention on Wednesday.

For men who presumably never wore high heels before, they were confident as they marched across campus Wednesday afternoon. Despite their tenacity, they were in obvious pain.

“Yes means yes,” they chanted in unison, “No means no.”

Walk a Mile in Her Shoes is a national event hosted at college campuses across the United States to raise awareness about sexual assault, said Bret Nielson, a SAAVI intern. (Sexual Assault and Anti-Violence Information.) SAAVI is a program at Utah State University that serves students, faculty and staff. Its goal is to support survivors of sexual assault, domestic violence and dating violence through events like Walk a Mile in Her Shoes.

Neilson said Walk a Mile in Her Shoes is a positive way to engage men in sexual assault prevention.

“For a long time, they thought sexual assault was a women’s issue, because women are being raped,” he said. “Well, of course that’s not true. It’s a men’s issue, it’s a human issue.”

Everyone is responsible for ending sexual violence, especially on college campuses where it is happening so frequently, he said. College women between the ages of 18 and 24 are more likely to be victims of sexual assault than any other demographic, Nielson said. But those numbers are hard to track because sexual assault is the most underreported crime. Also, the majority of sexual assaults are committed by someone the victim knows.

Nielson said there is a period of time during the first eight weeks of the academic year when sexual assault is most likely to occur, called the “red zone.” This is a time when college students are experimenting, whether that is through exploring different majors, drugs or their sexuality, and some abusers take advantage of that.

“Utah has more sexual assault compared to the national average,” Nielson said. “That is really concerning because usually we fall, like, two to three times lower on every other crime except sexual assault and we don’t even think it is happening.”

The SAAVI Office is a confidential place for those seeking answers about anything relationship-related, Nielson said.

“If you have questions or if something seems a little off in a relationship or something that happened at a party, reach out to us,” he said. “Just come and talk with us. We would be happy to answer any questions you have.”

Nielson said “Walk a Mile in Her Shoes” has two purposes. It gives men the opportunity to walk a mile in women’s shoes and gives them a small taste of what it is like to be a woman. “We literally did walk a mile,” Nielson said. “Walking in red high heels is a pretty daunting task for men because it is an opportunity for them to experience. What is it like to walk in high heels? Because it hurts.”

He said seeing a lot of men walking in red high heels with white socks and signs starts a dialogue about sexual assault prevention.

“As we walked around campus, people were looking at us and asking, ‘Why are men walking in high heels?’” Nielson said. “And they say, ‘Oh it looks like they are chanting about sexual assault.’”

Emmett Odegard, a junior at USU, said as a collegiate football player his head coach strongly advised the team to support Walk A Mile in Her Shoes.

“Aside from that point, I’m actually very interested in the differences between men and women,” Odegard said. “What women have to go through and think about that I necessarily as a white male don’t have to think about. This is the perfect opportunity for that.”

Luke Hansen, a freshman, said he decided to participate in Walk a Mile for completely different reasons.

“They were handing out free candy the other day and it’s for a good cause, so I thought I’d do it,” he said.

Nielson said he had no idea what size of women’s shoes he wears.

“I had to put on about three different pairs of shoes and I’m pretty sure I have a pair shoes that are too small,” he said. “Maybe it is because I am uninformed about how to wear high heels. All I know is my feet hurt after one mile.”

housing area known as the Island and a freshman majoring in business, says a lot of people don't know even know about the tunnel because it's so far south of Old Main and a lot of other student housing options are in the opposite direction.

Those who live in a convenient area for travel through the tunnel also have to worry about its safety.

Due to its location and lack of visibility from anyone not directly inside or at the mouth of it, the tunnel has presented concerns for those traveling alone, at night or too fast to notice anything that is happening around them.

"To help alleviate concern, it was decided to put in the cameras along with the access to emergency phones," Milne said.

On this aspect of the tunnel, students and the USU Police are on the same terms.

"It's quite the blind corner, which makes it a bit scary sometimes," Derbique said, as he recalled running into a student while riding his bike into the tunnel.

Bike crashes would not be the first of interesting events that have occurred in the tunnel.

According to USU Police footage, the tunnel has been a site for people urinating, marriage proposals and even attempts from students to drive cars through them.

For the future, some have suggested that the art department and Facilities look into allowing a class to paint a mural in the tunnels, but whether or not that will be executed has yet to be determined.

NCAA president 'takes pulse' at USU

By Kalen Taylor
SPORTS EDITOR

NCAA President Mark Emmert visited Utah State University on Thursday.

Emmert’s visit began early in the morning, meeting with all of Utah State’s student athletes to speak and answer questions. Then, he toured the facilities before speaking in the George S. Eccles Conference Center to an open audience. He gave a short speech before taking questions from those in attendance.

University president Stan Albrecht introduced Emmert. The two know each other from Albrecht’s service on the NCAA’s board of governors.

“Some of you may be wondering how the NCAA president ends up at Utah State,” Albrecht said. “I know Mark (Emmert) from my time on the board ... he and his colleagues visit institutions like Utah State and sort of take our pulse, listen to our students, listen to others and the questions you ask to get a better sense of what is going on.”

During his speech, Emmert explained that the NCAA is an organization consisting of 1,100 schools, 19,000 total teams and 465,000 student athletes.

Emmert also spoke about the important life lessons that student athletes learn from participating in sports and about how well they perform as students.

“Your graduates are better at leadership; they have the ability to overcome failures,” Emmert said. “Maybe what we need to do is be better at that type of education. You’ve got a really cool social-educational experience. As an educator, that’s really hard to do in the classroom, but it gives you that experience in sports.”

Before Emmert took questions from the audience, he explained the three goals that the NCAA has for student athletes. The three things that they focus on are academics, fairness and well-being of the student athletes.

“These three things have been the hallmark of what this organization is all about,” he said. “Over the past few years we’ve been able to really shift our rules for improvements.”

To prove the point, Emmert said that student athletes have better graduation rates across the board. At Utah State, the graduation rate is 44.8 percent according to the university’s website. Among student athletes at USU, the graduation rate is 87 percent, the highest among the four-year institutions in Utah.

He also highlighted the changes to NCAA rules that allow student athletes to retain eligibility, accept or decline scholarships and to get money for food and other necessities for living. After that, he focused on the well-being by speaking about the NCAA involvement in concussion safety and mental health of athletes.

Among popular topics in the question-and-answer session were paying student athletes and how much money the NCAA has and where the money goes.

“Should this no longer be about student athletes?” Emmert said. “Should this be professional athletes getting paid to play? Should they be getting a salary?”

Emmert explained that if you pay athletes, it becomes fully a business and only two sports earn money; men’s basketball and football. Along with the two sports, only 22 athletic departments across the country had a positive cash flow last year.

The money earned from football goes to the College Football Playoff gets split up between conferences and teams in the bowl games and the CFP, which runs separately from the NCAA. The men’s basketball tournament is the only championship of the 90 the NCAA puts on that makes money.

The 68-team tournament makes about 800 million dollars each year. From that money, 500 million goes to the schools based on enrollment and how many teams from each conference make it to the tournament and how many games each team wins.

After that, 100 million goes to schools for supplemental support, universities can use it how they want. Then, 150 million supports the other championships that the NCAA supports.

“Women’s basketball loses 14 million by itself,” Emmert said. “Once you get done splitting the money up, there isn’t much left. We can’t tell someone how much to pay a coach. We can’t tell them how to use the money they get.”

Emmert also responded to questions about bridging the gap between student athletes playing in college and getting jobs after school.

“We take a poll every year (in men’s basketball) and 75 percent say they will be in the NBA,” Emmert said. “Only 1.5 percent really make it ... Employers like hiring athletes but don’t know exactly why. We need to be better promoting them.”

Lastly, Emmert spoke about the new television contracts and what the future might bring for collegiate athletics.

“I think it’s going to be really fun to see where this all goes,” he said.

For Warriors Fans, 73-9 Is a Miracle

SCOTT E HALL
“King of Logan”
–Scott is a Stage Mgt major at USU. He writes articles, blog posts and songs in his spare time.

–scottehall3@gmail.com

In December 2005, The Utah Statesman wrote an article about the student team manager for USU’s women’s basketball team. His name was Atlee Zipf from Stockton, CA. He was my oldest brother’s best friend and had a heavy influence on my life. In my early teen years, Zipf convinced me USU was the greatest college in the world and the only NBA team worth rooting for was the Golden State Warriors.

In 2005, I was living in California and the Warriors just wrapped up their 11th consecutive season of missing the playoffs. It’s 2016 now. I write articles for Utah State’s newspaper and my Warriors just wrapped up the regular season with the best record in NBA history.

I now believe in miracles.

I’ve been questioning my loyalty as a fan since the Dubs hit the media spotlight. I realized I was a true follower when my roommate asked me, “It’s not like the Warriors were really ever that bad, right?” Anybody who truly knows the Dubs knows that we’ve always been bad. In March of 2012, our fans booed our very owner Joe Lacob off the mic during a pre-game speech about team history. I guess we had a good two seasons with Baron Davis. We had a lucky first-round playoff upset in 2007 against the 1-seed Mavericks. He led us over .500 the next year but we lost the playoff race. Aside from that, I recall looking up team stats wondering who the heck Monta Ellis was and why we ever traded Gilbert Arenas back in ‘03. From 1997 to 2013, none of our players made an All-Star game. People would react to my Warriors hoodie asking if that was my high school logo. Oh, how the tables have turned.

Yes, my Warriors love deems me worthy of the definitive hipster phrase: “I liked them before it was cool.” But I never saw it coming. I felt the magic watching us in the 2013 playoffs. We entered a 6-seed, made it to the second round, and were the only Western Conference team to win a game (we won two!) against the Spurs. Our season record improved the next year and I saw pure gold developing. Yet for any reason, we fired coach Mark Jackson. I loved that guy. He changed our team around! But perhaps our executives saw a bigger potential; something beyond the arc.

So in 2014, we gambled on a man with zero coaching experience, hiring the sharp-shooting PG from the 90’s Bulls lineup Steve Kerr as head coach. Somehow, the Dubs launched from being the Clippers’ allegorical little brother to being the greatest in the league. And now: The Greatest of All-Time.

My Warriors have come a long way in the last five years. We’ve won a Championship with 3-point monster Stephen Curry, who’s currently writing the final sentence of his second MVP acceptance speech. We have trustworthy shooter Klay Thompson and the stat sheet filler Draymond Green at his side. We finished the season 73-9, a record not even achieved by Michael Jordan’s Bulls. Michael freaking Jordan. If the forever-bad Golden State Warriors can do this, I can make it through college.

For all I know, we can still blow it in the playoffs. But it’s hard not to soak in this moment. I’ve watched the Dubs lose many games before I watched us get 73 wins. I accept bandwagon fans wholeheartedly. It’s just as funny watching Dubs fans pop out of the ground as it is watching my favorite team make a professional sport look like NBA 2K on Rookie mode.

Atlee Zipf, we’ve waited a long time for this.

Response to hateful letter

Jeffrey Dahdah
“Don’t drop that dahdahdah”
– Jeffrey Dahdah is a senior majoring in journalism. Please write to him or send him letters to the editor.
– dahdahjm@gmail.com
@dahdahjeff

We have received a lot of responses from a Letter to the Editor we ran in this paper on April 11.
Thank you.
This is my third school year being on the editorial board of the Statesman and I have seen many Letters to the Editor that make me cringe, including this one. Too often the ones that are upsetting are met with no response from readers.

This is, in my head, either because people aren’t reading or people don’t care. While the former is more likely, the latter scares me. So honestly, I was happy to see people angrily writing in about the letter, because it assured me that people were as upset about that way of thinking as I was.
The letter was terrible. It was written from a narrow-minded point of view from a small person. I know that; everyone on the editorial board knows that. So allow me to explain why it was printed.
This is our policy with Letters to the Editor: We run them unless they personally attack a person who is not a public figure. As is the norm for newspapers across the nation, the views expressed in these do not represent the opinion of the Statesman. We just provide the space, not the opinion. In many cases, such as this, we hate the content but believe in allowing views to be expressed.

I believe it would be irresponsible for us to pick and choose what would go in as Letters to the Editor, because then we would potentially be silencing opinions we don’t agree with and not allowing for an open discussion. That is why we stick to a strict policy on that. It is not for us to decide what our readers can handle as an opinion.
It has been pointed out to us that the person was not a member of the community. Something we knew. This individual is from Illinois. He is a member of an anti-LGBT advocacy group, as we found out later, and the letter may have been a mass email, but it was submitted to us. We have had discussions on looking into if letters sent in bulk to numerous publications will make our pages in the future, but that is for next year’s editorial board to decide.
We also have a policy for allowing letters from people outside the university and immediate community. We are at a university. Utah State boasts students and faculty from all 50 states and a multitude of countries. It is not a matter of geographic community. People come from all different communities and are represented at this university. In addition, people could end up in any community worldwide after they graduate. To limit views and opinions based off of a 20-mile radius of Old Main would be doing these people a disservice. Their background likely isn’t Cache Valley and their future likely isn’t in Cache Valley.

I want to reiterate I hated the letter. But we strive to serve as an open plane of discussion. This often doesn’t get used, however. So I implore anyone moved to anger and frustration by this letter to write in. I would happily order more pages if they were going to be flooded with opinions of support for the LGBT community.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR:

Letters to the editor in no way represent the views of the Utah Statesman. Letters will be published as long as they do not personally attack a person who is not a public figure.

April 11th’s Letter to the Editor

Response to Letter to the Editor

Hate speech is, according to the American Bar Association, ‘speech that offends, threatens, or insults groups based on race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, disability, or other traits.’ On April 11, 2016, the Utah Statesman published a Letter to the Editor that irrefutably meets that definition. The letter of which I speak was an inflammatory denunciation of the LGBT community, referring to homosexuality as ‘immoral’ and ‘[an] obvious disorder.’ Furthermore, the Statesman declined to include a disclaimer stating that the opinions reflected therein in no way reflected the official views of USU, the Statesman’s editorial staff, or the USU student body.
The author of the vile letter, Wayne Lela, is in no way associated with Utah State University. He is the founder of Heterosexuals Organized for a Moral Environment (HOME), which is, according to the Southern Poverty Law Center, an anti-gay hate group. He is not an alumnus, professor, or former administrator at USU; nor was his letter in response to any previous publications in the Statesman. I wonder, then, why the Statesman chose to publish his letter, given the content and its lack of relevance to the community at USU.

The most common excuse I have heard for this deplorable piece being published in the Statesman is “Freedom of the Press.” This leads me to conclude that the editors of the Statesman lack a fundamental understanding of what freedom of the press entails. The first amendment allows the press to publish without interference from the government. It does not, in any way, obligate newspapers to give a platform to people who incite hate. Freedom of the press allows any publisher the right to refuse to print anything, for any reason. I feel that hate speech is a legitimate reason to refuse to print something.
The fact that the Statesman allowed hate speech to be published in its pages reflects complete disrespect and alienation towards the LGBT community at USU. While the LGBT sector at may be only a small minority, they are nonetheless a vital component of USU’s inclusive educational environment. The fact that the Statesman allowed students of our community to be attacked in such a way is despicable. I hope that the editors consider implementing an official policy that will prevent this in the future.

Utah Statesman Letter

Hello, my name is Austin Sheffey and I am emailing you in behalf of the newspaper article from Wayne Lela.
How is it that a University funded newspaper allow a writer, who has no connection to the University, to have a hateful message published?
It is one thing to have an opinion but it is another thing to push these opinions on a University and its many members, whether they be faculty or students.
The article has been published, nothing can be done about that but what can be is that the people affected by this hateful message receive a public apology from the newspaper, that there is a disclaimer for all future letter to the editor and controversial publications that those words are not reflection of the opinions of the university, editors, or the newspaper, and that a policy be enacted by the newspaper to not publish future articles from hate groups.

Thank you for your time.

–Austin D Sheffey
adsheffey@gmail.com

In regards to the letter to the editor published on April 11th (you know, the one the renounced marriage equality as “heterophobic”, ‘crass’, and ‘inane’):
I’m not writing this to berate that letter, as it was clearly written out of confusion and maybe a bit of fear. That’s completely understandable. Change is scary, progress even scarier. The misandristic 19th amendment had many detractors during its time, as did the anit-white 13th amendment. Hopefully, I can quell some of this alarm with a few facts.
1. The writer of this letter claims marriage equality is, in some way, ‘heterophobic’. However, I’d like to point out that if you are an individual who identifies as heterosexual, this ruling should not affect you. If you are a member of a religion that does not support gay marriage, this ruling should not effect affect on you. If you are anyone other than an individual who wishes to enter a same-sex marriage, this ruling should not affect you. At all. It has been a better part of year. Personally, I have yet to encounter a single straight individual who has been forced to marry a person of their same-sex against their will. You can relax.
2. The writer insists that same-sex attraction is clearly indicative of some sort of disorder. But take comfort: homosexuality was removed from the DSM in 1973. Turns out, the only harm of same-sex attraction stems from people insisting same-sex attraction is harmful. Thankfully, we can put an end to that!

3. Thirdly, the writer cites the renowned philosopher Plato as a valid critic of homosexuality and a hero to ethics. But worry not! You don’t have to agree with Plato to be an ethical hero. Considering his support of pederasty, which he waxes elegantly about in Symposium, it may be more prudent to at times disagree with him.
I hope this letter helps calm some of the fears that were highlighted in the aforementioned letter to the editor. As a purveyor of knowledge and good will, it’s my desire to balance such alarmist codswallop with some long, hard, sweaty facts.
Last thing: That letter was not submitted by any faculty, staff, or student at USU. It was written by the founder of a group called Heterosexuals Organized for a Moral Environment, which has been designated a hate group. Is this an exciting new spotlight the Statesman has initiated? What hate group will you highlight next week? I can’t wait to read the letter to the editor written by David Duke. Should be good.
You can do better Statesman. Don’t let me down.

Motorcycles

I find it puzzling as I drive through Logan, looking to the sky at and its dark brown clouds looming over the people, why on earth would a place of learned people make it difficult for riders of motorcycles. Recently while parked on campus with my motorcycle displaying a yellow student parking pass, granted it was the one I purchased for my car, I received a parking ticket. Upon questioning the legitimacy I was told I have to both a car and motorcycle pass, no offense but it seems if I have the more expensive of the passes I should be able to use it and not be required to own both. It’s not as if motorcyclist drive both their car and bike to school. Discouraged.
